HOW THE ANGEL OF THE RED CROSS IS SPENDING HER LIFE'S SUNSET

A THOUGHTFUL man said recently that the familiar old motto, "A prophet is not without honor save in his own country" should be provided with a companion piece in these days—"A hero is not without glory save to the next generation." The man or woman who has performed some great service for the world gets his or her proper meed of praise and acclaim while those great deeds are still fresh and warm, and gains a lasting and even greater fame when history has put them upon its pedestal; but there is a sorry interval to the aged great who have outlived their own generation and linger on after their splendid achievements have cooled.

Not long ago a small boy who was visiting Washington with his father, was taken out to historic old Cabin John Bridge, and from the trolley car the house where Clara Barton is living was pointed out to him. The boy's eyes widened.

"Clara Barton!" he ejaculated. "Why, we're studying about her in our history now. Is she living yet, father? Great! I thought she died away back in war times."

It is beautiful that those who have devoted their lives to their country with the tirelessness and consecration that Clara Barton displayed, should be able to spend the sunset of their lives in quietly resting from their labors and in looking back upon lives filled with usefulness and fame, but it is a little pathetic, too, that they should slip so utterly from the sight of the world that once resounded with their names, and be allowed to sink back into obscurity.

Ranks With Greatest Heroines.

Thirty years ago and even later, the name and the fame of Clara Barton were spread through two continents. She ranks to-day with the greatest heroines the world has ever known, and history, half-century from now, will glow with accounts of her noble work. Yet she lives just out of Washington in a retirement that is almost isolation, surrounded by only a few faithful friends, who have spent their lives in her service, and nearly forgotten by the heedless generation that follows her.

Now and then some old and staunch friend of Miss Barton makes the long trip out from town to the big yellow house at Glen Echo, occasional sightseers, and curious strangers invade her solitude, and from time to time she makes a short trip into the city herself; but for the most part she spends long, sunny days in her little house overlooking the Potomac.

This house, a roomy one, built for suffering in the Johnstown flood, and afterward given to Miss Barton and moved by her to Glen Echo, is a rather dreary place in winter, although it is delightful cool in summer. A trip down the wide hallway running through the center of this house, on a bleak winter's day, is enough to chill the marrow in one's bones, but the long walk ends in a warm, sleepy sitting-room, which is inviting in its comfort. Old-fashioned cushioned rocking chairs, a lounge with bright colored Afghans upon it, and a great waterfall of Wauder Jew in the window all breathe of the quaint home-likeness of a quarter-century ago. Miss Barton fits into it like a picture in its frame, and a chat with her there is the sort of experience that finds one coming away smiling a little.

Mentally Keen at Eighty.

The winter months, when the Virginia hills opposite her study windows are forlornly bare, Miss Barton spends writing and reading. In spite of her eighty-odd years, she is mentally keen and interested in all the events of the day, and she keeps up with current affairs to an amazing degree. Now and then articles from her pen are sought by various publications, and it is hinted, too, that she is busily preparing a volume of recollections, which shall perhaps be somewhat in the nature of an autobiography. Miss Barton has for years been urged to write such a book, and since her connection with all public affairs was severed, some two or three years ago, she has been giving more and more time and attention to her personal writing.

Her habits while thus at work are curiously erratic. She is up early in the morning, and often by daybreak the scratch of her pen may be heard in her study. During the day she often takes little naps, resuming her writing with fresh vim, and frequently she will lie down from 8 to 9 o'clock in the evening until 10 or 11, rising then busily until 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, to go vigorously to work and write. One of her most faithful companions states that frequently when she has had some difficult piece of writing to do, she would go to the kitchen and work energetically with her hands, at canning or freezing, or some domestic task—all the while revolving her subject and its arrangement in her thoughts. Then suddenly she would go to her study, take up her pen and write her article with scarcely the change of a word. She insisted that her thoughts came much more clearly and smoothly when her hands were occupied.

Goes North for Summer.

During the summer months, Miss Barton generally goes to her old home, the little town of Oxford, Mass., where she was born and where her remaining relatives still live. She is dearly loved and revered there, and is usually the patron saint of the young men and maids of the graduating classes. She has an unflinching interest in young people, and enters into their ambitions and troubles with real sympathy. Another of her great pleasures is the annual reunion of the G. A. R., where she is always a beloved and honored figure. The old "boys" have never forgotten the heroism and courage with which she went among them, helping to save their lives, and here a grateful word goes out to her a gratitude which never forgets nor takes for granted the great work she has accomplished.

During the last summer, when Clara Barton's secluded home at Glen Echo has been invaded by an amusement park, the adjacent grounds of a defunct Chautauque, having been metamorphosed into an electric-lighted whirl of hurdy-gurdies, scenic railways and loop-the-loops. Indeed, as the ground upon which Miss Barton's house stands is owned by the corporation managing the park, a stretch of the mimic railway actually crosses her lawn. It is evidence of the remarkable equanimity of this aged but serene woman that the din and the aspect of this place disturbs her not at all. She proceeds, calmly with her quiet life indoors, and works now and then in her garden, intent upon the flowers and vegetables there and apparently oblivious to the air of modern life which buzzes at her very doorstep.

"I shall be away from it most of the summer, and I dare say the young folks are very happy there," she says.

is carefully watched over and guarded by a number of loyal friends who have for many years devoted themselves to her. Her most faithful friend, and assistant is Dr. J. R. Hubbard, who has for many years acted as her secretary and assistant. Dr. Hubbard has given his life to helping Miss Barton and her cause, having been with her during the relief expeditions in Russia and Armenia, and later in Cuba and at Galveston, the latter disaster having been the scene of Miss Barton's last active relief work. Dr. Hubbard, in attending to many routine matters, business affairs, and traveling arrangements, spends his entire time in freeing her from the cares which would fall heavily upon her in her advanced years.

In appearance Miss Barton is interesting chiefly because her hair, which is very heavy, is as glossy dark as it must have been sixty years ago.
